

Price of electrical distribution box installation on a construction site in the Netherlands

AI Overview

Electrical distribution boxes on Dutch construction sites can be moderately expensive, with costs varying based on size, capacity, and whether they are rented or purchased.

Purchase Costs

For permanent installations, a new consumer unit (fuse box) typically costs between €450 and €800, depending on the number of groups and the brand chosen. Smaller units with 4-6 groups are at the lower end, while larger systems with 8-10 groups are more expensive due to additional materials and installation complexity. Materials account for roughly 75% of the total cost, and high-quality brands like Hager, Holec, or ABB may increase the price slightly but offer greater reliability and longevity .

Rental Costs for Temporary Use

On construction sites, temporary distribution boxes are often rented rather than purchased. Companies like Van Lieshout Elektra provide high-quality temporary distribution boxes that meet strict safety standards and can handle both small and large power capacities. Rental costs depend on the size and capacity of the box, the duration of the rental, and any additional services such as installation or expert advice. Renting is generally more cost-effective for short-term projects or sites whe...
